The United Kingdom authorities have approved an Assyrian memorial to be erected at the National Memorial Arboretum in Staffordshire England.

The Arboretum is a national site of remembrance that serves all arms of Army, Navy, Air Force and allied forces. The Memorial site is a sacred area in which members of the public, royal family and today's military pay their respects all year. The site also attracts more than 300,000 visitors with over 200 special events held each year.

The approval comes 6 weeks after Mr Gaby Kiwarkis, President of the Assyrian Levies Association made a trip to England to meet with high ranking military officials.

The Ancient Assyrian themed memorial will commemorate WW1 combatants and civilian causalities, and WW2 Assyrian RAF Levies.

Mr Gaby Kiwarkis said," This memorial will be officially dedicated by the 'worldwide Assyrian community', and not by any individual organisation, because everyone deserves to be recognised for their efforts towards this monument regardless of how large or small".

Mr Kiwarkis also stated, "we like to invite artists and architects to volunteer their time to submit other designs or similar with changes for consideration".
